The medical market for knee joint replacements is substantial in the United Kingdom, and the demand is growing. A knowledge of the tribological behaviour of knee joint replacements would aid their design. It is now generally accepted that the primary determinants of tribological performance is the relative frictional resistance of the articular components with respect to the contact bearing surface. The primary role of the contact bearing surface is to promote an enduring surface contact with the articular joint components whilst also providing an interface that minimizes the contact area of motion between the articular components and the bearing surface. The frictional resistance between these two contacting surfaces determines the resistance to relative movement, and this resistance is affected by the tribological properties of the materials that constitute the two contacting surfaces. Most complications associated with knee joint replacement are attributed to the cause of failure at the articulating surfaces of the bearing components. It is commonly accepted that this surface wear is caused by inadequate bearing surface material properties, including poor tribological performance, and the role of the bearing components in this process is well described in the existing literature. However, tribological performance and the associated wear phenomena at the metal-bone interface are complex phenomena with a number of different properties including microstructure, geometry, roughness, material chemistry, surface morphology and stress distribution. A detailed knowledge of the microscopic and macroscopic mechanisms which govern the tribological behaviour of materials is needed if the performance of a particular bearing surface material in vivo is to be accurately and reliably predicted. This paper will present a detailed methodology for the evaluation of the microstructure and associated tribological performance of trabecular bone as the primary artic
