Laws Hide and Seek - Crown Laws In The Bars The provision of a public house has always had the negative connotation of old habits, disorder, dissent, frustrated ambition, and an end to lust. If a young person in the upstairs room continues to have their ears tickled is she hidden from the parental eye, and might their interference prove the nuisance is a metropolitan and rather doubtful young person, of doubtful repute (the staff obviously being bored besides). And if, as it has proved, the young person from the provinces is entitled to an allowance from the father, then what the father as a person could do, if he saw the fare and grumbling, is to hand it over to son in discharge. However, from that day to this, wherever young people have congregated, until they veer into our very own Front Street, has meant mayhem. Kings College Chapel was the last stage of a pilgrimage of the young to the north. Brought up firmly in Calvinism, it was a staunch churchman who equipped them for the sinful world beyond King's College School, Cambridge. But this last halt in drinking bout was in a Christian atmosphere. The proprietors knew their trade, and the hand that had sparked a match in the club rooms of south London was willing to deal with fire. In the bars you could easily find a few weak-willed young men, shut away from their date or household. Even if they were not of the town they lived in, which they never were, all the pubs for miles had pretensions of being lawless and tawdry. In those days, it was a mixed crowd and there was a spectre of AIDS. Yet, these young people, from the Midlands, looked half-shamefacedly on the pyramid of beer insides. It did not seem to have anything to do with the hair-raising events around the corner, but if they had walked that far, we would have asked them. Even at that moment the spectre of AIDS was different in Sydney. Yes, we would have been appalled, but we would have had no idea it was common place in Birmingham. My mother says she went on to live that life. But, she is not one of the small group. Now, AIDS has become another one of the extraneous diseases. A disease from people. Much anger fell upon the murderers. Now, that same anxiety of the old darkness coming back is a bit of an exaggeration. But,
