The game's development was originally commissioned by the game publisher, D3 Publisher, which was acquired by YUUDA (Developing Games Together A Limited Liability Company). As a result, production has started as a courtesy of the developer. RIVER OF NEW HOPE is developed by a team of professional game developers including staff from D3 Publisher. Its original concept and many elements came from the concept of the Open, a brand-new genre of RPG created by D3 Publisher. You can play the game's early stages for free, and you can enjoy the game's full version by paying a reasonable price of $19.99. RIVER OF NEW HOPE will go on sale on Steam, the PlayStation Store, and the Xbox Games Store on June 29. ■ UI The UI is designed to

Ted Cruz won the straw poll in the Wisconsin Republican primary. He beat Fred Thompson in New Hampshire, and he's a favorite in South Carolina. The only thing bad in the polls for him is the "polls" themselves. John McCain's been getting better lately--and he has to beat a VERY weak field to get a win. John Walker and Hillary got less than 10% in South Carolina. McCain needs to pull an upset in either New Hampshire or South Carolina to win. And if McCain wins in New Hampshire, he and his tiny staff will expect to be reinducted. That's just what the self-elected "leader" of the party does. Everyone knows they can't beat Hillary (at least not now, not in the general), so they only stand a chance of winning if they have enough influence to force the other candidates to split up resources against Hillary in the general. Only McCain is running in that role, so he gets the nomination, the delegates and the cash. All of these are combinations of various models for the GOP. If McCain ends up with most delegates before the convention, it will be because he has won the most primaries. The issue is: How does a poll with different numbers get reported as a poll with the same numbers? There are two possibilities--the different way each firm reports its results, or one firm's tally is more accurate than another's, e.g., some firms' totals are based on more calls, such as in the poll asking for delegates' preferences. In 2000, the putative front-runner, Bob Dole, only got 31% of the vote. The media at first claimed that every poll confirmed Dole's lead. It didn't. But after the media got over its head, Dole got 46% in one of the last polls before the election. But if you look at the numbers, you can see who did better: So McCain barely holds on to second, and former candidate Fred Thompson has been driven into the background. The bottom line is that the same polls that have McCain in the lead in South Carolina have him in the lead in the popular vote by 10 points in South Carolina and winning or sharing victory on the primaries by 20 points. So far, a lot of people are getting news headlines from "the polls" that aren't accurate.
