But on July 27th, it ran aground in a remote northern Norwegian fjord, according to a report by the Sea Wing's The Strait Times. The submarine, known only by its boat number 132, went onto a reef and was later refloated by the company who freed it, according to the report. "We are unable to confirm this story and it is not yet known what damage to the submarine may have occurred during the grounding," said a Sea Wing spokesperson. "The Sea Wing is currently doing an investigation and is in the process of contacting the vessel's owners." Reports of accidents involving Russian submarines are common, and the divers at Sea Wing often encounter vessels that have hit objects or become stuck over the years. Svilius Suburbs, SV48, ran aground in January 2014, and after it was refloated, a Russian rescue team was brought in to aid divers that freed the vessel. However, what caused it to ground is still under investigation. The Russian VB11 was launched in 2011. It is one of three new Krasnoyarsk-class boats to be built for the Russian Navy.Q: APNS token expires within 24 hours, how to persist it we are using APNS in our app. We get the ids of the devices within 24 hours and update the database which holds the ids.
