For years, Playground Games has been one of the few game companies to leverage the biomechanics of football movement to enhance gameplay. In the early days of the FIFA series, the physics engine would respond to animated player movements via physics based animations, which resulted in a game that felt natural and authentic to the real sport of football. Playground Games (then codenamed “Now”) worked with biomechanists to model the physical movements of each player, resulting in the first “living” team moves. Another Playground Games skill is being able to focus and hone on core gameplay mechanics through iteration and feedback. The company has honed its gameplay art with FIFA 15, with the visually reworked player animations and ball physics, creating an immersive feel to the gameplay. In FIFA 22, Playground Games is marrying that passion for core game mechanics, player animation, and physics to “HyperMotion Technology.” Post-launch, Playground Games will continue to polish the game’s core systems, while refining the game’s look through new visual effects. This new year’s edition will also include several gameplay improvements, with players seeing more of a goal-scope and improved goalkeeping, which should, hopefully, result in more goals in the remaining matches of the season. Of course, this is the final FIFA we'll be playing before the Switch launches on August 3, 2018.

For now, here's how FIFA 22 plays: Closer to the goal After years of near-perfection, the FIFA engine finally faces some challenges: keeping the ball more central to the center of the goal, closer to the center of the field, while also reacting more dynamically to the players. Here's a play that shows off the new closer-to-the-ball physics. A defensive midfield play is progressing through the midfield, and a striker manages to cut off the defensive midfielder from the center of the field. Because of the ball's smaller size, players are less able to avoid the ball, and the central player on the defensive line over-reacts by heading the ball to the goalkeeper. The reactions are tough to see, because the ball in this shot is so small. Here's the same play with a larger ball that shows the ball's increased size, providing more space for players to avoid the ball

Fifa 22 Features Key:

- HyperMotion Technology
