I also had a job interview with them a month before.

What stood out was their questions. I mean, to their credit, they seemed to have pretensions of being able to discover a possible flaw in someone's work, but most of their questions were about things that, as an intern, I had already proven myself without them asking.

For example, one of the investigators spent 30 minutes asking me about the energy consumption of my project's algorithm, because my code was running on a constant timer so if I accidentally pushed the button to kick a process off, my project would be actually finished very early: yes, I had tested this, yes, I was able to deactivate this feature, but a prosecutor has to check the feature, they will never have time to go through it themselves, so this was useful and it saved this particular investigator, 30 minutes of his time, which I said you could get for this amount of money.

Did anybody else have any problems with them asking questions they shouldn't? Did they really try to discern if you had done the above mentioned, or a dozen other things? Did you feel pressured because they didn't reveal all of their secrets? Did you have better chances with them because you had published results?

I'm curious about this, in the end I got a good chance though, so I'm happy, but I hate to think about what might happen to me if the other one comes out on top. ===== santaclaus It is a revolving door. Everyone would really feel that a lot of risk would be involved. You are best left to try to gracefully exit the
