Vecna Lives in DnD 4th Edition source. Mitt Romney is winning the Republican primary despite a huge budget deficit. Seriously, a huge budget deficit. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office (CBO) projected that this year's deficit, at least for the current fiscal year, will be $666 billion. That's $57 billion more than President Obama's budget office projected. The latest numbers show that a whopping 54 percent of federal spending this year is accounted for by programs that were scheduled to expire at the end of the year. These include programs such as Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF), the Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP), extended unemployment benefits, the stimulus law, and the Community Health Centers (CHCs) program. That means spending could go up as much as $57 billion, not down as the White House projects. And we're not even including the Obamacare cost overruns (which are likely to be substantial). If we're not going to address this, then how do we expect to fix the deficit? The nonpartisan Washington Post's Ezra Klein put it perfectly when he said: What the past year shows is that the federal government has demonstrated that it can successfully spend more than it takes in. What it cannot do is execute on that spending. That's the case with unemployment insurance and health reform. And it's the case with our budget deficit. The president ran for reelection on the fact that he promised to cut the deficit in half by the end of his first term. The president has tried to claim that he has cut the deficit "as a share of the economy" by $5 trillion, but the budget deficit as a percentage of the overall economy has not gone down as he claims. We have a big deficit, but it is getting smaller, just not as fast as the president says. What Romney is proposing is much more modest than what the president promised. He's proposing that we eliminate the deficit in four years. What he is not proposing is to actually come up with a way to fix this. And that's the key, since a large part of the economy is going to suffer as a result of the deficit -- even if the deficit is not cut as much as it would otherwise be cut. We don't even have an answer to the questions: How do we fix the economy? What do we cut? What do we cut so that we don't hurt the economy
