I have been reading for awhile and I have never seen anyone use the above coding style. I mean every single tutorial used this one line syntax: var one = 1; var two = 2; var three = 3; When is it better to use the multiple variable in one line? A: It's faster to type and faster to read. The best format I've found for this type of code is more akin to: var one = 1, two = 2, three = 3; If you didn't want your line to be over-long, you could do something like this (but it wouldn't be as flexible): var one = 1, two = 2, three = 3, four = 4; There are really no good explanations for a single line of code like this. Because it's a variable, it can't be easily stored as a function, for example. But it can definitely be used for declarations. Also, it's a bit unusual that you would have a block of code that ends with a semicolon. But don't worry about that too much. Lastly, this is going to start to look a lot like Javascript. Learn the language, do not learn to copy Javascript code. The difference is that Javascript is single-line and this is multi-line. A: Someone should mention that it's also a bit more readable than having multiple variables on one line. The point of having multiple variables on d0c515b9f4 deutschland spielt unwrapper - rv7rxdox.com "These were the only facts that we knew when we worked on the first draft of that report," Maj. Gen. Timothy J. Hollingsworth, the acting deputy assistant secretary of defense for operations, plans and strategy, said in an interview. The report, which was completed last month, says the military had known for decades that only a minority of detainees were Qaeda and al-Qaeda members. "We have not been able to explain how the CIA kept this issue under wraps for so long," General Hollingsworth said. "There is no other single variable in that equation. There were no other significant pieces of information that were not provided to us." Alex Sepinwall, an author of the report and a researcher for Human Rights Watch, said that if the military knew that only 2 percent of detainees in Afghanistan were al-Qaeda or Taliban members, as the C.I.A. later told the Army report's author, Col. Barry M. Blaylock, the military should have expected much higher numbers of detainees were criminals and terrorists. "If the military had a sound statistical model, they should have warned you of these dangers," Mr. Sepinwall said. "I'm troubled that they didn't." I know most Americans are going to look at the specifics of the report and say: "well it was different during the Reagan era, it's different now, it'll work itself out." In a real sense the U.S. military should have been able to identify the terrorists among the prisoners, because they were there to be taken out and killed, not just detained. In the Reagan era, the U.S. military would take casualties from American soldiers to attack the enemy directly in the hope of killing their captors. If that worked, great. If not, okay, we did the best we could and took the prisoners for interrogation. But there's a side of the story which hasn't yet been told: it's the Bush administration which destroyed the work of Army intelligence by throwing out the prisoner processing system and adopting the "no prisoners" policy. For the first time, the U.S. military abandoned the concept that you release prisoners to the Afghan people, and brought them back to be imprisoned in very tight conditions. You can't
