What's new in Dreamlike Worlds:

Artworld Review: On Display at the Museum of Pacific Art Celebrating the beginning of the new year and new show, Dreamlike Worlds, you can see images of this Korean artist's work on display at the Museum of Pacific Art through March 22. by Eric Harvey Think of yin and yang, the elusive balance of polarities, the complementary principles that are the heart of Eastern philosophy, and you'll get close to the principle behind Hwang Jin-Yu's manifest creations. Just as humanity seeks to acquire primal balance, Hwang Jin-Yu's sense of belonging goes beyond the imaginary or spiritual. The balance manifests from consuming the original matter and transforming it into art. Sharing her creations with an equally curious public will likely be a revelation, and a reminder, for those who've had the unfortunate prerogative of being blindsided by a charismatic artist. Hwang Jin-Yu, mid-nineties, 2005, Seattle. Photo Credit: Lili Zhu @bodilyhappines. His new exhibition at MOPA, Dreamlike Worlds, can be described in a single word: lovely. The exhibition, of artwork collected from several of Hwang's solo and collaborative exhibitions worldwide, features the representational, often mythical and abstract creations that are Hwang's signature aesthetic style. There are illusions, illusions bordering on the grotesque as well as a few live interactive paintings that can be browsed in the current exhibition. The exhibition title, Dreamlike Worlds, is itself an apt description of both the display and the effect Hwang Jin-Yu's works in this exhibition have on the viewer. Discerning vision is nothing new and its fundamental tenet is to see the world with clarity, yet to this exhibition's delight, vision is destabilized, distorted, altered, and can bear little resemblance to anything seen during sleep, or by partial wakeful attention, when the brain is not fully alert. The fact that Hwang Jin-Yu can deliver the same message across so many media and their mediums doesn't make much sense until you understand how far one can push an illusion by being precise and consistent with the message. Dreamlike Worlds is curated by the curator of the show, Jeffrey V. Schropp, and it runs on an even keel through the main gallery and a small additional area, which is set up for changing
