Content partitioning is the process of logically dividing a content stream into multiple streams, each of which can be processed independently. For example, when a content stream is encoded/compressed, the result of the encoding/compression may be a logical hierarchy of several “dissimilar” content streams, such as a video stream, an audio stream, a subtitle stream, a captions or closed captions stream, and a metadata stream. It is important to note that all video streams are not created equal, i.e., not all video streams are made of the same kind and amount of information (e.g., video bits, audio bits, text bits). That is, a video stream may be better served by processing it in the abstract as only (x,y,t) points-in-time, wherein the x and y position represent encoding parameters, and the t is the specific time that a specific point-in-time is being processed. Accordingly, the content partitioning process creates a hierarchy of separate streams that are suited to be processed as they are. As an example, a video stream usually is comprised of many frames. Each frame (of the video stream) can be encoded, using a suitable coding process, to produce a plurality of differential frames. Among the results of this process might be a video stream, a metadata stream, a captions stream, and an audio stream. The metadata and audio streams contain data that is being processed in the “context” of the video stream (such as, for example, timing information about the video frames). Accordingly, while the audio might be present, the metadata stream will only contain information about the metadata that is related to the video stream. And, the captions stream could be present “for” the videos stream, or it could be a separate stream that explains the text of the captions. The content partitioning process can then be used to convert the multiple frames produced by the encoding process into independent streams that are suited to Imagine a simple game about everyday life. A simple story line, a few hand drawn graphics and a few mechanic to test your reflexes. Then throw in a few exploring, puzzles, monsters and enough combat to keep you on your toes. But what keeps your attention will be the character, his hands and his personality. A journey is not complete if it doesn't touch you. The game is designed to be easy to use, but with a challenge to explore the world, faces and inner workings of the characters, not to mention the mechanics. Gameplay: Welcome to a medieval world where the most common means of transportation is by horse. The main character you follow, Edmond, is not any normal person either. He is a simple peasant who is doomed to follow the farm until the village noble sends him on his quest. With the village of Mosscroft and the neighbouring village of Fairbridge as his starting points he starts off on his journey on his trusty steed. On his journey Edmond has a set of simple tasks which are shown in a notebook in a notepad; new seeds for the farm, search for new horses and wood or take out the sheep from the barn for slaughter. While on his way he could make the game much harder by killing a few bandits on the road or happen upon other travelers who will be travelling with him. The game has been designed with a heavy focus on puzzle solving and exploration, not to mention a few monsters that can challenge a player. Following the player are static objects such as trees, rocks, water and more. To escape from danger, or enter an area with something you can interact with, you can interact with the scenery with Edmond's hand. Gather up stones and wood to build a home for Edmond, or even make a fireplace. By selecting objects you can push, pull or even pick them up. Simple enough, right? But be aware of the pressure you are applying and make sure you are standing firm. I'm sure you can figure out how the right timing and pressure can mean life or death in some areas. Simple as it sounds, although the gaming mechanics do have a lot of depth to them, there is also an interface to follow and support for the gaming mechanics. Edmond will wear a pair of gloves, which when he holds his hand out, shows the objects he can interact with. When he grabs something, you are notified if he has pushed it or pulled it.

Why Get Pizza Heroes?

Why get Pizza Heroes? Because we hate third party game development!

We like to build games on our own with our own engine and thematically based on entertainment movies. We're always building something new and better, we don't just clone old concepts and update them.

We don't like 14 year support cycles that let blockbusters in from 1990 get reimaged in 2011 and let the market play with it.

We're basically working as an indie game studio with a way more exciting way of working. We're trying to achieve team goals while keeping in mind to do things in the best possible way. We have a very interesting and unique culture where we allow the people who are supposed to do things to do them naturally and mess them up. We like the best results when things are intuitive and the plan B is our first instinct as we get going. We strive to make fun and joyful games and follow all rules not to break them while we develop our next big success.

Playing Pizzas Heroes is fast fun. It takes around 30 minutes to a few hours for the first time and another minutes to hours if you like it. While playing you
