World's poorest see proportionately more migrants A lesser known but disturbing fact is that migration is higher than any other commodity over the last three decades. The reason for this is that, for the past three decades, countries with a higher level of human development experienced a lower than expected migration. The reason is that there was an increase in the standard of living, better health, and often better education. Consequently, these countries had lower than expected levels of net migration. By contrast, in developing countries, there were more migrants than expected. In reality, these migrants were usually labourers, either because they had been displaced from elsewhere or because they were forced to migrate due to a lack of employment opportunities in their country of origin. As a result, the average income and the average population of people migrating from developing to developed countries are lower than the average that would be expected. Most of these migrants are, therefore, poorer than the average population of people. In any case, the recent migration waves of refugees and migrants are the result of conflict, war and forced displacement. The vast majority of the refugees are from the developing world. For the past three decades, there has been a general increase in both migration flows and the movement of populations from developing to developed countries. The 10 fastest growing countries in 2016 were
