[/spoiler] Q: How do I start a Apache benchmark on Ubuntu 16.04? I have Apache 2.4.7 installed on Ubuntu 16.04. To make it run well it needs about three-four hours of continuous CPU resource. How can I do this? A: If you want to run a load on the server, use the apachebench command. apachebench does a small workload on the Apache server, so it's more accurate and less resource intensive than a normal load test. apachebench -n 10 -m 5 -v -f This will run a two-node cluster, with one node being the client and the other being the server. This will mean that the client simulates a user that wants to access a web site, and the server simulates Apache serving up that web site. The -f flag means to start a new thread for every request. The -m flag means to measure the requested resource, rather than waiting for every request. The -n 10 option means that 10 requests are made, each of which is for a single URL. The -v means that you want to output the statistics to stdout. Finally, the -v option means that you want verbose output. Use more to get even more detail about the requests, or less to minimize the output. You should try running this without -m, if it seems to work OK, you can try adding -m to see what the impact is. A: I use good ol' apachebench -n 10000 -v You can also start it without any flags, so just apachebench.
