Q: How do I make angular CLI overwrite its own default styles I'm new to Angular CLI, and I don't know how to overwrite Angular CLI's own default styles so they do not merge with styles from the project. A: if you only want to load your css file you have to use `@Component({ selector: 'app-root', templateUrl: './app.component.html', styleUrls: ['./app.component.css'] stylesUrls: ['./styles.css'] })` instead `@Component({ selector: 'app-root', templateUrl: './app.component.html', stylesUrls: ['./styles.css'] })` if you only want to load a css file `@Component({ selector: 'app-root', templateUrl: './app.component.html', styleUrls: ['./styles.css'] })` Q: Is there a "transport" channel to STS? I'm just curious to know if there's a way to connect to an STS (Seamless WebSocket Transport, a protocol that's more robust than HTTP) channel via HTTP? E.g. I can set up a HTTP server and simply connect to it from a browser, no problem. I also know that you can use JavaScript to connect to a socket, but I need a pre-existing endpoint to connect to, and that server needs to be serving all kinds of other things. I know that there's a temporary subscription channel you can send messages to on the STS (via `/metadata/tempSubscriptions`, when there aren't any stable subscriptions available) but I can't find a way to send to that channel from anything besides the browser. Developmental lines and organization of the human brain. This contribution focuses on a second fundamental theme in developmental neuroscience, i.e. the description and analysis of the organizational principles within the central nervous system (CNS) during the first years of life. The nature of these principles is discussed with regard to two questions: In which order do different functional areas of the brain emerge in an evolutionary sense? What can be said about the functional integrity of the developing CNS? I present my own findings on the cytoarchitectonic organization of the cortical and subcortical structures of the human brain in the first year of life and argue that the different functional areas of the brain are sequentially activated along pre-established developmental lines. The spatial position of these lines resembles that of the "nest building behavior" and "corridor systems" of certain social insect species (e.g. honeybees). In order to review and further extend this analysis, I also discuss our present knowledge on brain development in non-human animals. This review is divided into five parts: 1) The idea of a "nest building behavior" and its correlation to the appearance of functional areas. 2) The theoretical background of the organization of the mammalian CNS and its relationship to the different functional areas. 3) The cytoarchitectonic map of the neocortex during early postnatal life. 4) The developmental organization of the cingulate gyrus and medial geniculate body. 5) A summary of brain growth and dendritic development in non-human species. Q: Why do we tend to stop a Churchwarden before the first stop of the Kia Ora cycle? This is an Australian expression: Kia ora means hello. It is used as a greeting, for a start, by putting the hand and arm or forearm outstretched, at an angle of about 45 degrees, for 5 or so metres or yards and saying kia ora. I've heard that in the UK one would be more likely to say kia ora if one did it while cycling. But from the Anglican tradition in England - which is very common in the UK -, one would say kia ora while at church, and at home, one would say it to one's wife or daughter, and also at work. But it sounds just strange to stop one's bike in the middle of the road to say kia ora! To me! (I'm from Australia
