The elimination of patient motion and the reduction of patient and technical radiation exposure are the two major challenges in fluoroscopic digital subtraction angiography (DSA) for vascular imaging. Both can be reduced by using the best possible scanner settings, and by employing high quality images. The elimination of patient motion is the objective of patient immobilization and may be based on electrocardiogram (ECG) gating. By integrating patient motion or ECG signals into the DSA system, the addition of a sinusoidal motion profile may be achieved. However, the DSA system must provide a system of imaging in real-time, without delay. Once more, timing is required, and this may be achieved using a computer-controlled mechanism to stop the image acquisition, when the fluoroscope X-ray tube is blocked by the patient. Further technical progress may be achieved by implementing optical-digital subtraction angiography, which is a technology in development. Studies from the literature show that such a technique has the potential to reduce noise levels by over an order of magnitude. The steps required for scanning a human body and the associated system are critically reviewed.
