I have used mobile application which has only 2 screens which are login and main. These screen are showing proper features. The application is designed in iOS. I have recently learned and played with Android. Recently i have been considering switching to Android, My big question is, If I choose Android, Which OS should I learn. If I choose Windows, which IDE should I learn. P.S. My mobile applications are always 2 screen based apps.. A: I have recently learned and played with Android. I think you already have a good start there. Recently i have been considering switching to Android, My big question is, If I choose Android, Which OS should I learn. Assuming I understood you correctly, you know what they say: When in doubt, go with the platform you are most comfortable with. Android is a combination of an OS, and a development platform. Many apps are written natively in Java. Others are written with languages like Kotlin, Objective-C, or C/C++. The reference platform for Java is Android, and the IDE you use for Java development is Android Studio, which is built on the Android SDK. If you want to code in Java, you can. Android Studio will help you with the development language, and the IDE itself provides a lot of features that aid your development, particularly for Android: using Gradle for better and cleaner build system, Android Studio's advanced code assistance, etc. However, there are also many Java APIs and libraries that can be used to write apps for Android. Many Android apps are written with libraries like Retrofit, Room, Dagger2, etc. If you choose Java, you'll be building an app for the Android OS, and using Android Studio. If you choose Kotlin, you'll be building an app for the Android OS, and using Android Studio. If you choose C/C++, you'll be building an app for the Android OS, and using Android Studio
