Published on Friday, Jan. 10, 2012 by Christina Bono My column today covers the Grady Claybrooks trial in which State Medical Examiner Dr. Kimberly Jones testified that Claybrooks died of a gunshot wound to the head. Her primary finding was a wound to the forehead. (Published Monday, Aug. 24, 2011) Yep, it's time for the real estate services industry to invest in some midi skirts. And perhaps some cornrows, too, for some. A lawsuit filed by the estate of two women who have accused industry leaders of running up legal bills for some of the industry's brightest stars without the women ever receiving a penny for legal fees, finally went to trial. Claybrooks, who was a real estate agent for Kelly Williams Realtors, was found dead in a closet at his northeast Fort Lauderdale home in 2009. His death came less than three months after a Broward judge set aside a $1 million settlement that Williams and another agent had agreed to with Claybrooks' estate. The judge found that Williams knew before the settlement that Claybrooks was on the verge of filing a lawsuit against her, her family members and others over their alleged fraudulent actions leading to his death. The estate has filed a lawsuit against Williams and four of her relatives. Until the house that Claybrooks owned was seized by tax collectors, he had a plum retirement deal. His monthly pension checks were supposed to go to an annuity and after he died the annuity was supposed to pay his family $15,000 a month. Williams arranged to have her great aunt put the annuity into a 401(k) account so that there would be no property tax bill for Claybrooks' home. But somehow the judge did not believe that Williams had the mental capacity to use the annuity and she agreed to turn over the money to Claybrooks' estate. As for Clay
