Main menu Post navigation Nikon D90: Initial impressions I know I've been very slow to write my first impressions on this camera, but I've just been using it for a few days, and I'm impressed! I said I wouldn't do a how-to writeup for this camera, but I'm going to. You really can't better the forums on the Nikon website, so I figured this is as good a place as any to start. I haven't found the camera to be as tricky to use as my old D70, and as a DSLR, its differences are very minor. The biggest difference to me is the screen: it's significantly sharper and has a much smaller (i.e. more comfortable) view. Nikon D90: Screen impressions One of the things I miss on the D90 is the back-button zoom out (from 3.2x to 20x), but the supplied lens covers a range from 12.3-500mm. I'd recommend getting the 50/1.4, 100/2.8 or 12-24, personally, as I love the 50mm focal length for portraits. The flash is still a bit hit-or-miss to me (mainly because of the light levels it does it), and it does seem to be something that's changed in the driver's firmware, because the first couple of shots I took off a tripod just had the flash come on briefly, then shut off again before I did anything. Features The most obvious feature of the camera is the screen: it's sharp, clear and very easy to read. The menu system is very similar to the D70s, with only two minor changes: a field monitor and a new "A" button. The D90 has built-in pop-up flash and self-timer, and also has a range of other features which weren't available on my old camera c6a93da74d
