EmÂ .Coupler A coupler (in English), also called shackle, is a device used in connecting together two adjacent ends of two separate pieces of pipe. It is usually used in steel piping where it joins a pipe to a pipe, tee, flange, or any other similar item. The term "coupling" can also refer to a version of the coupler for connecting together two adjacent ends of two separate pieces of piping, a multi-piece coupling. The common types of coupler are: Monobloc coupling (UK: Monobloc or mb) - a coupling and a flange with the same centre ring diameter. Fork coupler (UK: fork coupler, or FC) - a coupling with 2 flanges, one over the other, each with a centre ring. Pipe joint coupling

(UK: pipe joint coupling, or PC) - a coupling with 2 flanges, one over the other, each with a centre ring. Monobloc coupler The Monobloc coupling is a double ended coupler used to join together 2 pieces of pipe to form the flow path of a pipeline. It is a ring structure with an outside diameter (OD) of about. Monoblocs are available in every OD from up to. Usually each half of a Monobloc has a flange, but if the coupling is long enough one of the ends can be without a flange. Monoblocs can be welded or bolted together to form a complete coupling, or they can be connected with other couplers using bolts. The Monobloc coupling is normally used with plain end pipe or in conjunction with a bell-and-spigot joint. Fork coupler The fork coupler or FC is a double ended coupler that is usually used in a line where the total pipe length is very short. It is designed for short lines ( c6a93da74d
