One big flaw in IPv6 was the name, IPv6. To get around this flaw, a new alternative, IPv6-over-HTTPS, was developed. In this new scheme, the IP address is not in the URL, but instead it's passed to a server using TLS, which encrypts and sends the information. It was expected that IPv6-over-HTTPS would be a big deal, but until now, it has never really taken off. Now, thanks to eTLD, the development team is predicting that it will now start to take off in a big way. What started out as a one-off hack with the developer now hopes that with the development of open-source programming tool named IPv6-over-HTTPS with SNI-Onion Routing, the industry can start making large-scale use of this new IP protocol. This can allow for the growth of the web to become more secure and efficient, and could even create some of the most interesting and innovative new features of the Web of the future. is important to understand what is new in the operating system. Windows 10 will not be hitting full production until later in 2018, but the Microsoft team has released a preview version for the final program. Is it worth the wait? Google is championing IPv6. Google now accepts IPv6 on all services. Anyone can now point their computers to an IPv6 address for a Google service. It is expected that this is the beginning of a series of moves towards IPv6 as more and more of the industry moves towards it. Read the full story here.
