Originally introduced by Starke in 1999, the StKeys tool is free utility for generating and displaying public-/private-key pairs used for Wi-Fi encryption. It is also able to generate WEP- and WPA-encoded keys and dictionary keys. Users may generate key pairs, or one can choose to load an existing pair from disk. StKeys requires an installation of a X.509 Certificate Authority (CA) that has been signed by Starke. Neither an OpenSSL nor a GnuTLS CA is necessary. The software works well on Windows systems and is available in download packages. New to the latest version - MS10-076 - of StKeys is the ability to not only scramble the plaintext, but also to scramble the cyphertext. This is accomplished by the new "plaintext+cyphertext" option. This was tested with the WPA-PSK cipher, with and without 2-byte MSDU NACK CRC=3. This resulted in a longer attack time by about 6 seconds. With a 2-byte MSDU NACK CRC=3, it took less time to crack the pair, so there is no improvement. With 1-byte MSDU NACK CRC=3, the pair is unbreakable. Once you have the hash, you can use the stkeys tool to try to crack the encryption. Note that the key is stored as hex and has no LSB, so the first byte will always be an 8. The second byte of the key is the MSB and will always be either 0 or 1. This leaves only 5 possible values for the first byte: 8, 9, a, b, or c. This means that there are only 25 different keys, plus the default key, so we should be able to find it with around 25 tries in most of the cases.
