Q: How can I avoid using the "vacuum" statement if "foreign key constraint" already exists? SQL Server and Sybase say that the following statements are equivalent (not the same): vacuum table [identifier]; alter table [identifier] drop foreign key [key constraint name]; Is there any case where I can guarantee that I don't need to execute the "vacuum" statement? A: There are a lot of assumptions here. Here are a few key ones: A foreign key constraint on a table prevents the table from being dropped. The opposite isn't true. Dropping a table doesn't enforce any foreign key constraints. You must be using the default "on update cascade". Or, if using a trigger, the foreign key must be set as NOT DEFERRABLE (I don't remember which). Your DDL is not being evaluated as a "SET STATISTICS IO OFF" or "SET STATISTICS TIME ON". The "vacuum" clause is not the only way to vacuum a table. There are also "truncate table" and "rebuild statistics" commands. If you are explicitly specifying the vacuum clause, the statements are different. If you just have a

The impact of interpersonal and intrapersonal factors on patient outcome after traumatic brain injury. The objective of this study was to identify the impact of patient and therapist variables on outcome following traumatic brain injury (TBI). The study sample included 231 male patients with TBI who were being treated in a brain injury rehabilitation program. Assessments of patient and therapist variables (e.g., cognitive-behavioral treatment competencies) were completed at the beginning of treatment and again at the end of treatment. Data on global outcome were collected through self-report by the patient and patient-reported assessor (e.g., family member, friend) through semistructured interviews. After controlling for the effects of other variables on outcome, patients who were able to more actively participate in treatment and who had fewer concurrent substance abuse problems showed significantly greater improvements in global outcome. The degree to which a patient actively participates in treatment does not appear to be related to the severity of the patient's injury. Therapists' experience with the treatment of TBI was not related to outcome, suggesting that expert training in treating TBI is not sufficient to explain the beneficial impact of treatment on outcome. The effects of patient variables were not significantly related to the therapist's treatment competencies. The results support the importance of helping patients to be more actively engaged in treatment and of finding ways to help patients with concurrent substance abuse problems to abstain from abusing substances during treatment. The findings suggest that there may be value in helping patients to experience more positive outcomes by actively participating in treatment. The findings also highlight the need for further research to identify the mechanisms by which the studied patient variables may be affecting outcome and to determine whether they are generalizable to other patient populations.
