A considerable percentage of patients admitted to intensive care units (ICU) suffer from impairments in their capacity to manage independently in the community, often needing long periods of rehabilitation in specialized rehabilitation units. However, patients' needs are underestimated by medical staff, so decisions regarding care are often based on the assumption that the ICU will provide complete care until discharge, or that patients will return to the community. Currently, few rehabilitation centers have the specialized and well-trained personnel and resources to offer comprehensive rehabilitation, and many units do not have specialized units that offer rehabilitation at all. Therefore, there is a widespread perception that only a minority of ICU patients need rehabilitation, and if provided will be unmanageable and complicated by frequent transfers back and forth between units and lack of continuity of care. In the UK, the majority of day-care services have been transferred to community hospitals for routine care, and rehabilitation is usually provided in centers that are not dedicated to this purpose. ICU-trained staff need to be prepared to provide training in rehabilitation
