Google is trying to go after the use case of many, including:

- Separate devices: signing in outside of your primary computer, phone, and email makes sense, so people can keep their identity separate.
- Memory less devices: signing in while on a Chromebook or even a laptop could help people keep their memory usage in check.
- Compatibility: signing in on different platforms (Android, iOS, ChromeOS, etc) with your Google Account could also eliminate much of the friction that comes with not only age differences but even phones, tablets, and laptops.

I've been using PS a lot lately in addition to Lightroom. I like it a lot more than PS. I use the new repairs, filter, etc. but what I really like is the fact that it is able to 'repair' a JPEG in little time, at the touch of a button. Also allows for better cropping (Keep N bits) editing, etc. Thanks for the great coverage. Yesterday, Google introduced digital signatures. The official announcement describes the technology as "an improvement to the way we protect websites and the way end users and users of web browsers can check whether a claim about a website is accurate," and it should be noted that most sites integrating Google Accounts also use email address verification. The page states that Google will be supporting the technology for all Google Accounts over the next few weeks. The company's official training manual for the Chrome Pixel , which was posted today, also shows a picture of a signature, stating that the device can "sign documents with the facility of your PC, so you don't need a separate device," though not that the Pixel can also be used to sign documents. A Google spokesman said via email that it is currently "an early proof of concept with proof of concept device."
