It is known that a so-called wide distribution of a road reflector is such that the reflector is to be placed on a surface of a road in such a manner that the reflector has a predetermined longitudinal width to be maintained along a width direction of the road. A certain distance between reflectors adjacent to each other is required for the purpose of preventing interference between reflectors. On the other hand, it is sometimes required to install a reflector temporarily in order to provide a certain warning or to keep a distance in the width direction of the road. Further, it may be required to install the reflector on the road in a position corresponding to a road construction for a specific purpose. The use of the reflector under such various conditions is difficult to realize as an individual reflector having a proper longitudinal width can be manufactured only at the cost of a greater amount. As a solution to such a problem, there have been proposed a plurality of sheet-like reflectors of a size of a road panel or a sheet-like reflector assembled with a plurality of support members
