How do you respond to media criticism that you have a monopoly on a product that users love, but are willing to pay good money for? Adobe has gone full-throttle into attempting to protect its image and convert its software from a great piece of engineering into a game-changing business platform. They may have a leg-up in the beginning; commercial applications which license LS will cost a lot less than Photoshop. For fairly obvious reasons, the price will go down as the support period goes on, and with more and better features they will lure users in. Ultimately, Adobe has to compete head-to-head with its own applications and mediums, not other software and hardware. Users will pick technologies and applications that work for their workflow, not apps. And unfortunately, Photoshop must settle for being one of many tackle box solutions, not the one and only. Until Photoshop 6 or PS7, the average user had no choice in what office software they used in editing, because commercial alternatives like Adobe Envelope, QuarkXPress, and CorelDraw were more expensive and could not easily be used for editing resizable files. It's fair to say that Adobe had a choice to make, whether they were knowingly trying to start a war, or just a bit stupid about their own product. Either scenario is a bad start for Adobe. Much has been written about Photoshop and Lightroom, and the triaging of information for weeks now in the Adobe forums. If the team had been less determined to protect their product, I truly believe they would have replied at the top of their capacity to me, apologized for their inability to respond earlier, and even outlined their plans for a patch. Instead, they failed to reply to some of the more important initial queries. In all, this is not a good start for their new software. It's also not a good start for Adobe, which desperately needs to improve its commercial software, because that is how it will continue to generate revenue and recruit more users. Adobe does not have to compete on price, it should compete on features, ease of use, functionality, and the quality of its apps.

Bragging about features is not a sufficient answer to this sort of argument. So what really constitutes a monopoly? Are we talking about a simple monopoly? A horizontal one, or a vertical one? I am totally against any company claiming a monopoly if they manage even a single hardware product. So I don't think we are talking about a monopoly on a single product. Rather we are talking about a monopoly over the auto makers, the retail salespersons, the CD companies, and the tires, which are all single-item services. They make their money selling a single discrete item. In fact, what Adobe confronts is a classic "monopoly we cannot afford to lose" situation. Of course, creating a monopoly really is risky, and the organizations that attempt to create them must develop shareholders that have no vested interest in competing with them. They must also protect it from foreign competition. Meanwhile, other companies that don't develop and protect this threat are disadvantaged and come to terms with the inevitability of doing business with them.
