13.0 is most definitely a totally new product and should not be likened to past versions, which was a statement that seemed obvious at the time. However, 13.0 is not dramatically new. It is a more polished version of features that have been available for the last two years through the Tutorial feature or as Movies and Presets, albeit in primitive form. Other than the introduction of the "Healing Brush" which is totally different, I believe the only other example of something unique in 13.0 is integration with the Creative Cloud. However, what 13.0 does bring are a lot of UI enhancements - things like dedicated Undo/Redo key, faster and smoother menus, and a new Lens Correction feature which made me swoon. I'm not entirely sure what the point of this is, but it's becoming more and more apparent with each new release that this version is about refining and updating a product. Think of it like a car manufacturer introducing a new model, but for them, the old model is still in production. The IP of the old version is still there and the new version is the addition of something purely for the benefit of the consumers. I say this as I'm getting pretty familiar with the interface of 13.0 and the more time I spend with it, the more I like it. When browsing through the Adobe website for the "Introducing Adobe Photoshop 13" announcement, I came across three things that are worth mentioning. First, the last few versions (i.e. 12.x) of Lightroom 5 and Photoshop 11.x introduce a new feature called "Scripting." With this feature, users can call a function written in JavaScript or "Visual Scripts" at run time. Up until now, the user could not create Visual Scripts but had to rely on scripting languages and plugins. The release notes state that the Scripting feature allows users to "write scripts using any programming language supported by the operating system."
