No evidence of sexual assault has been found, and many believe the women did not provide enough evidence. However, the protesters say it is not a cultural issue but a "lynching" issue, referring to the dark-skinned man's race. "Lynching is a racial crime", says Vishnu Reddy, a 28-year-old politician from Andhra Pradesh. "I feel India is a Christian nation. But it is not a Christian nation. This is a country of Muslims". Last month, a video clip showing a couple was widely circulated on WhatsApp. The woman is wearing a sari and is seen falling to the ground along with the man as they sit together at a roadside restaurant. The video is allegedly of a married couple in India committing suicide by hanging in September. But it was only last week that the anti-rape movement went viral with the case of the Delhi rape and murder of a 23-year-old medical student. Since then, dozens of women have come forward and demanded the death penalty for the Delhi rapists. "We don't want just to punish them. We want to change this mindset," says 35-year-old Tarika Mitra of Hyderabad, a feminist and the co-founder of Bezawada helpline, a volunteer group that aims to help women at risk. "There is pressure from society to prove our consent. Why is she wearing a sari when going out? It makes her vulnerable," says Mitra. "Should women be afraid to roam around? While victims are raped in remote areas, this is not the case. Most rapes happen in the city." The Delhi gang rape of December 2012 was supposed to be the turning point. It sparked a series of nationwide protests and forced the government to introduce laws to protect women. While it is not known whether the Delhi gang rape came before or after the introduction of the laws, national leaders say it has made India a safer place for women. "The Delhi gang rape changed everything in India," says Sonia Gandhi, former prime minister and leader of the opposition Congress party. "India changed overnight. There has been a turning point." Wiping out female stereotypes The phenomenon that goes by the name Nirbhaya, or "daring", is a term that sprung from the Delhi gang rape. But even the origin of the term is controversial. Many hold that the name came from a 2008 book by journalist Shekhar Gupta, in which
