There's an interesting dynamic at work in Photoshop. While you have access to every single pixel of an image, you really only see the pixels that you've designated — and you see them in all of their detail — if you have multiple layers of the same image open. Step into the Layers panel and you'll see all of your layers arranged in a window. Click on the Lens icon at the top of the window, and you can change the size of the window so that you can see more or less detail at a time. Just as you would choose emphasis for a headline, you can push all of those layers down and put them into a single layer. In other words, the advantage of multiple layers comes courtesy of the limitations of the screen your using, not by the fact that there are more of them than ever before. e3d0a04c9c
