Developers, businesses, and consumers are flocking to Snow Leopard in increasing numbers, but don't expect to see the full features of the operating system in the new version. Apple has slowed expectations of updates for compatibility reasons, and its developer community is unhappy about the settlement. Adobe using its own tool for PDF FileManager is very useful, but also makes me wonder whether there's much point to having an app named that when Adobe already has a built-in Adobe Flash-based tool. Furthermore, I'm not sure the menu translations make much sense - they're not really suitable for a free app. Finally, Adobe is "launching" Photoshop CC on iOS, going from three screenshots of Photoshop CC's new color panel, plus one of a workflow, to a primary aspect ratio, and the promise of more soon. You'll need to be working with 2D images to appreciate Photoshop CC's new panel. Any attempt to import a 3D image would be thwarted by problems with the current display. In any case, what's really needed are new features, particularly camera editing and positional adjustment capabilities in Photoshop CC. The former would seem to be aimed at the YouTube generation. The software could be used for importing and manipulating clips from cameras as well as editing or simply using clips shot on the device. This would allow either new users to get more out of their existing camera presets or would provide advanced users of the app with a greater array of options and features.
